A: Since the table "flashing" mode is the only flash mode that actually projects a beam of light, you won't be able to communicate with the machine at all when it is in that mode. The long-term objective of this project is to define the mechanisms of thermal injury. The specific aims of this project are to: 1. Establish the extent of injury in tissues and cells of the liver during hyperthermia and the role of intralysosomal accumulation of calcium. 2. Determine the survival properties of liver cells at temperatures which are known to produce consistent liver injuries and at temperatures which are known to produce only transient heating effects. 3. Examine the cell damage produced during thermal injury with and without protection against calcium overload by pharmacological means. 4. Identify the cell surface characteristics of normal and injured cells by immunofluorescence techniques and examine the effects of drug and thermal injury on the expression of cell surface properties. This basic study will answer basic questions regarding thermal injury of the liver, and may provide models for thermal injury to other tissues and organs. These studies should ultimately prove to be of use in the treatment of hyperthermia-induced liver injuries such as those caused by radiotherapy or radiotherapy or surgery. The identification of cell surface characteristics which are unique to normal and damaged cells may provide models for thermal injury to other tissues and organs.
